Abstract: Historia Agraria, which focuses on the agricultural and rural history, is a four monthly publication produced in English, Portuguese and Spanish specialising in the history of agriculture, economy and rural society. The publication is a meeting point between various disciplines which have in common the analysis of agricultural history and the economy and rural society. Historia Agraria was founded in 1991 by the Sociedad Española de Historia Agraria (SEHA). This association had been founded in 1990, with the aim of setting up periodic debates and opening up lines of communication between specialists. Its intention was to move away from the isolation and individualism with which rural historical research is sometimes associated and discuss common themes and plan them without the rituals and protocols associated with large events and conferences which often produce little results. The journal embarked on an upward rise until in the mid nineties it became an accredited publication of international scope not only for its ‘visibility’ in databases but also its warm reception amongst European and American specialists. It was undoubtedly helped by the design of an open editorial policy and the demand for quality criterion for the publication of materials. Historia Agraria is indexed in the Arts & Humanities Citation Index (A&HCI) and in the Social Sciences Citation Index (SSCI) of the Institute of Scientific Information (ISI).
